Before diving into these devices, a word to the wise: “At-home devices are generally weaker versions of in-office procedures and do not yield comparable results while carrying higher risks of complications,” Dr. Teresa Song, board-certified dermatologist at Marmur Medical, tells The Hollywood Reporter. “These devices are available for hair removal, microneedling, as well as LED light treatments aimed at reducing wrinkles and acne. These devices are not required for FDA monitoring and may potentially lead to complications if used incorrectly. In-office lasers used in medical spas for hair removal, which undergo FDA monitoring, are considerably more effective, and carry less risk of burns and hyperpigmentation compared to at-home devices when performed by experienced physicians.”
